Q: How to organize my display in real time data feed I have a web app that displays customer information, with two windows. One on a user's computer and one in a browser on my web server. On the windows on the server, the data feeds are different. For example, if a customer has Facebook, Twitter, and other social media sites, I have data from each of those sites. The real time data feed that I need is from Facebook and Twitter. I'm not sure on the best way to display this data. So I display one window at a time. User 1 opens the app and gets Facebook and Twitter. User 2 opens the app.

Everything is clear because they only see data from the sites that User 1 opened. If I were to add another window, then I would have to display the Facebook, Twitter data twice to both users. What would be the best way to solve this type of real time data feed? A: I don't see why you would need to display the same data twice. There's nothing preventing you from viewing two data feeds on a given page in one window. This could be done by either providing two HTML buttons with the URLs to each data source, or have one URL link and wrap them both in a tag with a common class: Click for Facebook Click for Twitter Facebook Twitter You can style them f678ea9f9e
